The scene changes, but the loop remains.

Whether you stand on the shore watching a wave collapse into foam, or in the middle of a crowded city street bathed in neon, the underlying sequence is identical. The dust settles in the exact same pattern. The realization hits at the exact same second.

We believe we are walking into the unknown, forging new paths and stumbling upon unwritten fates. We are not.

Every word you are about to speak has already cleared another throat. Every choice you think you are making in isolation has already played out—either in a parallel scenario just inches out of sight, or right here, in this exact spot, under a different sky. The scenery is swapped to deceive the eye; the story itself is an ancient repeating echo.

We aren't creating the journey. We are simply waking up inside it.

i know your confused about the word what this weird guy is speaking
